

SUMMARY: The document below is a letter dated 11 October 1563 in which Oxford's mother, Margery Golding, thanks Sir William Cecil for his care of her son, ending the letter with a blessing for Oxford.

The purpose of her letter is to request Cecil's help in obtaining corn (that is, grain) for her household provision at Colne priory. Before coming to Colne priory she had been promised by the tenants that they would pay her the corn which was due to her as rent, but on her arrival the tenants were forbidden to do so by Robert Christmas' man on the orders of Sir Robert Dudley (later Earl of Leicester), who controlled the core lands of the Oxford earldom in Essex, including Colne priory, during Oxford's minority through a grant from the Queen (see WARD 8/13, Part 25, manor of East Bergholt).

The letter demonstrates Leicester's callous treatment of Margery Golding after the 16th Earl's death, and the loss of favour endured by her second husband, Charles Tyrrell, one of the Queen's Gentlemen Pensioners.

The letter also indicates Margery Golding's solicitude for her son, and her gratitude for Sir William Cecil's 'gentleness and fatherly friendship' towards him.

Ihno(?)

[f. 96r] After my right hearty commendations, gentle Master Secretary, with like thanks always for your gentleness and fatherly friendship towards my son, and therefore altogether unable any ways to recompense you & my Lady your bedfellow, only remaineth my goodwill to pleasure you or any of yours if ability served, and now less able than ever I was, without your present friendship.

And only herein may your friendship stand me in stead, and the rather by your means to enjoy certain rent corn for the provision of my poor house, whereof I had promise of divers of my late Lord's farmers, and thereupon hoped. And of late, since my coming to house at this Michaelmas, there hath been commandment given to all those farmers that pay corn that they should not pay me any corn. And I having but one farmer that payeth me any corn, there hath been commandment given there to pay me no more, which was very much, to bar me of my own rent corn, & not much neither, in the whole but 10 semes.

But how this terror cometh to the farmers of late I cannot tell, but the bruit goeth of Mr. Robert Christmas' man, and certain I am he was with my farmer & gave him commandment to pay no corn (and, as the farmer saith, in my Lord Robert's name).

But sir, if it may be your pleasure that I may have but part of such corn as was commanded to be delivered to my late Lord & husband (whose soul God pardon) at his house of Hedingham, or Colne, where I now lie, it might do me such pleasure as without that help I stand at this time cleanly destitute of any provision of corn.

And for that I could not conveniently tarry any longer where I sojourned, for the great years both in the gentleman & his wife, and perceiving some infection to draw near to those parts, I practised with the farmers beforehand & sent to them, & they promised me to serve me of such corn as would very near suffice me, and now since my coming to house hath bred such a misliking and stoundness among them that now stand I clean barren of any provision of any sort of corn, and like enow without your present help to be no ways salved, [f. 96v] whereof I most heartily pray you.

And for that you do right well understand (& we hear) that to travel any way almost is not very pleasant & altogether without surety, else would Mr Tyrrell have travelled and have waited upon you himself, who cannot well travel any way from these parties towards the court without some great misliking of his access into her Grace's presence, whereof we would be both very loath, and loathest of all to adventure anything whereof there might right well rise just cause hereafter to repent us both.

These things weighed, gentle Master Secretary, I most humbly pray you so to consider of them as my necessity requireth to be holpen of you, and pray you herewith of some comfortable answer to be returned from you, and to that end I have sent one to be attendant of purpose. And loath to be too tedious, I most heartily pray you impart my like hearty commendations to my good Lady your bedfellow, and to my son with God's blessing & mine, & well to do to his life's end. At my poor house at Colne this 11th of October, 1563.

Yours right well assured in that she may any ways pleasure you,
M. Oxinford

Addressed: To the right honourable and her very loving friend, Sir William Cecil, knight, Secretary to the Queen's Highness.

Endorsed: 11 Octobris 1563, Countess of Oxford [In another hand: She desires that she might have her rent corn for the use of her house which was ordered to be stopped]
