FENELON 1

SUMMARY: The excerpt below from a letter to Queen Catherine de Medici written on 15 February 1569 [=1570] by the French ambassador to England, Bertrand de Salignac Fenelon, seigneur de la Mothe (1523-1589), accompanied a letter written on he same day by Fenelon to King Charles IX of France (1550-1574). The excerpt deals with Oxford's request that Queen Elizabeth grant him leave to serve in the French wars.

Queen Elizabeth's position throughout the French wars of religion was highly ambivalent. She secretly favoured the Huguenot rebels on religious grounds, offering aid to them, and allowing young Englishmen to serve in the Protestant forces led by Henri (1552-1588), Prince of Conde. Openly, however, she was careful not to oppose King Charles IX, a fellow monarch, on the general ground that England was weak at the time, and on the particular ground that her open support for subjects who were in rebellion against their sovereign on religious grounds might encourage the same thing in her own realm. Thus, when Oxford, a high-ranking nobleman, requested permission to serve with the Huguenot leader, Conde, the Queen replied that she could not permit someone of his stature to fight alongside Conde, who was making war against his King. Oxford then discussed with friends the possibility of enlisting in the King's forces, and when this became known, was summoned by the Privy Council. Members of the Council, like the Queen, favoured the Huguenot rebels, and were prepared to deal somewhat rigorously with Oxford for his expressed desire to fight on the King's side. As Fenelon notes, however, the Council was astonished to learn that Oxford's position resulted directly from the answer given to him by the Queen that it would be inappropriate for him to join the Huguenot forces under Conde. Only after receiving that answer from the Queen's own mouth had he discussed with friends the possibility of fighting against Conde in the forces of the French King. Faced with the Queen's own pronouncement, the Council dropped the matter forthwith.

The letter is found in Correspondance Diplomatique de Bertrand de Salignac, de la Mothe Fenelon, Ambassadeur de France en Angleterre de 1568 a 1575, 7 vols (Paris and London, 1838-40) at i, pp. 197-8.

FENELON 2

J'endendz, toutes foys, que, ces jours passés, au comte de Oxfort, jeune seigneur bien estimé en ceste court, qui desiroit veoir de la guerre, et inportunoit la dicte Dame de luy donner congé d'aller trouver le prince de Condé, après plusieurs reffuz, elle luy a respondu qu'elle ne vouloit q'un tel personnaige des siens se trouvât avec ung qui estoit contre son Roy. Dont luy, despuys, devisant avec d'aultres seigneurs de bonne volonté, leur a dict qu'il desireroit que la Royne, sa Mestresse, luy donnast congé d'aller servir le Roy, et qu'il combatroit volontiers contre les rebelles, qui luy faisoient la guerre; de quoy estant taxé, il a esté mené devant les seigneurs du conseil, devant lesquelz il s'est monstré si résolu en son opinion, qu'ilz ont estimé que cella venoit d'aulcune pratique des Catholiques, dont luy ont vollu user de quelque rigueur; mais, après leur avoir dict franchement ce que la Royne luy avoit respondu, ilz sont demeurez toutz estonnez, et ne luy ont rien plus répliqué.

De Londres ce xve de février 1569.

I hear, however, that a few days ago the Earl of Oxford, a young lord well thought of in this court, who desired to see the wars, and importuned the said Lady to give him leave to go to the Prince of Conde, after several refusals she answered him that she did not wish a personage of hers of such stature to be found with one who was against his King, which he, afterwards discussing with other young lords of goodwill [to France], said to them that he would desire that the Queen, his Mistress, would give him leave to go to serve the King, and that he would willingly fight against the rebels who were making war on him. Being accused of this, he was brought before the Lords of the Council, before whom he showed himself so resolute in his opinion that they considered that it arose from some practice of the Catholics, for which they wished to use him with some rigour, but, after he had told them frankly what the Queen had answered him, they were utterly astonished, and said nothing more to him.
