Most illustrious and esteemed Sir,

My friend, Master Ley, coming to court, I did not wish, for the great obligation which for divers reasons I owe to your Excellency, to fail to write you these few lines for that I hear for a certainty that your Excellency intends shortly to journey to Scotland, if it please God, and for that occasion I offer my life and the sincere loyalty of my service, which, if your Excellency should deign to accept of, employ me to what purpose soever, even to the death, which I can perform worthy of you. And should your Excellency grant me that wished-for favour, that you would also deign to tell the above-mentioned bearer what I must do to put myself as soon as possible in readiness to perform my duty at your command. And thus I remain, kissing your Excellency's most illustrious and valorous hand and with all due reverence recommending myself to your Excellency. From London this day, the 9 of August, 1583.

Your Excellency's affied(?) and devoted servant,

Rocho Bonetti
